

A Mislabeled Can

From time to time I received notifications of The Barna Group's studies and surveys of American Christianity. It is helpful in understanding why this country is in the mess it is in, and how supposed Christians seem to have little to no influence on this nation. Well, the latest Barna Survey shows exactly why "Christians" have little to no influence in America today.

Plainly put – they are mislabeled.

Now granted, they are self-identified as Christians. But, doesn't that make the report all the more condemning? After all, a bunch of folks out there identify as "Christian," and they do not have the foggiest notion of what a Christian really is.

I wonder where the fault lies for this one: America's churches, perhaps?

The report is here:

Most American Christians Do Not Believe that Satan or the Holy Spirit Exist
